Mine Health and Safety Council Tripartite Summit – Innovate and Elevate: Breaking Boundaries To Achieve Zero Harm

The UASA Minerals Division team is actively taking a central role in addressing one of the most pressing challenges in the South African mining industry at the Mine Health and Safety Council (MHSC) Tripartite Summit taking place at Gallagher Convention Centre until 18 October 2024. The summit focuses on enhancing progress, exploring new innovations, and strengthening the collective resolve to create a safer environment for mine workers.

For UASA, whose members work in high-risk environments, these discussions are crucial in advocating for better safety standards and protecting workers' rights. The summit unites key stakeholders, including government representatives, industry leaders, and labour unions, across the current state of mine health and safety and charts a path towards the shared vision of achieving zero harm in mining operations.

UASA President Phisoa Mphahlele delivered a keynote speech reflecting on the challenges set a decade ago in 2014. At that summit, government, industry and labour came together to envision a safer future for mine workers in the post-apartheid era. UASA's ongoing efforts to reduce workplace injuries, diseases, and fatalities, setting a framework for collaboration that would guide the sector's efforts for years to come.

"Breaking boundaries is not easy but necessary. To achieve zero harm, we must constantly build and elevate our efforts to new heights. Together, we can build a mining industry that paves our way forward without compromising the lives and health of those who make it possible," emphasised President Mphahlele.

UASA's participation in the summit alongside the reflection on the 2014 objectives, serves as a reminder of the significant strides made towards a safer mining environment. This is also a call to action to keep pushing boundaries, innovating, and working together to achieve the ultimate goal of zero harm in the mining industry. The collaborative spirit of the tripartite approach remains the strong force behind every initiative, ensuring that health and safety in mining is not just a priority but an ongoing and relentless journey towards a safer future for all workers.
